And yet, as the election turned into a referendum on national policy, Mr Obama, who normally associates himself with the values of the middle class, rather than with the elite, did sound as though he was speaking from that position: "The top 1%," he said, "the wealthiest family in the United States, earns as much as the bottom 95% of Americans. That is wrong. It has to change." The fact that he has not been able to carry out this promise is not because he lacks the power, but because the overwhelming political force in the country is not the people who are getting screwed, but the donors who fund both parties, and the moneybags who are putting on these galas. So what does it matter to the political workers that they have been busy reorganising their own party? It matters, because it is very hard for a political party to change, and the Democratic party is in danger of being a fiefdom, committed to the business community for financial and social reasons, and equally devoted to the party bosses. All the old slogans about the invisible hand, social harmony and the free market are now the best that can be expected from business and from the media.
